PREFACE.

From a look only at the top-line of the title-page, or at the names on the back of the present dictionary, the reader might easily be led to imagine that it is a triumvirate of authors who share among them the responsibility for its publication. To prevent any such error, which is only too likely to occur, we state expressly that the two undersigned alone are to be held responsible as authors of this work. The name of Dr. Felix Flügel occupying so prominent a position on the title-page, is in compliance with an urgent request of the publisher (to which that scholar gave his consent) arising from previous stipulations.

As regards the relation of our work to Dr. Flügel's "Universal Dictionary" (1891), we may say that for the English-German part we have used it more as a starting-point than as a basis, and that the present book is by no means a mere abstract from, or adaptation of, Flügel's larger Dictionary, however able and excellent an achievement that work may be in its way. Although we gratefully and freely acknowledge that we are deeply indebted to it for many valuable details, we must, on the other hand, say as much of most of our other sources, and an attentive reviewer will grant that, while we have endeavoured to appropriate everything good wherever we found it, we still have tried to preserve our independence all through. Thus, where it seemed desirable, we went our own way, whether as regards the matter or the form, the development and arrangement of significations, or the marking of pronunciation. If this is true with respect to the first volume of the work, it holds good to a still greater extent concerning the German-English section, which claims to be considered an entirely independent work. In compiling this second part, we have, next to Lucas's extensive work, been most materially assisted by Elizabeth Weir's German-English Dictionary published by Cassell & Co., London 1892. By adding numerous synonymic hints we have tried to help the foreign student to catch the exact meaning of German expressions and phrases, but above all our endeavour has been to guard against mistakes in translating, and to give advice in every particular case as to the choice of the correct and appropriate expression.

Our dictionary being intended "for home and school", we have kept within certain bounds, and have not aimed at absolute completeness. We have restricted the number of purely scientific and technical terms so far as to insert only such as occur in works likely to be read by the educated classes. Expressions which might have proved puzzling to those who do not boast a special or technical education, have been briefly explained. On the other hand, whatever belongs to the Pre-Elizabethan period has been omitted, unless found necessary for the understanding of modern literature. Shakespeare's words and phrases have, of course, been paid due attention to; whereas the writings of his contemporaries, which do not form part of our school-reading, and can be of interest only to professional philologists, have been almost entirely left out of account. Thus space has been gained for the admission of numerous idiomatic phrases and modern familiar expressions. Provincialisms, as well as slang-terms, have been embodied in our work to a considerable extent, because they are constantly encroaching upon the conversational language even of the educated classes. Scotch and Irish idioms, as well as Anglo-Indian expressions could, we thought, more safely be neglected, as far, at least, as they have not yet been generally received into English literature; a fair amount of space, however, has been allowed to Americanisms. In all cases admitting of any doubt, special care has been taken to ascertain the true meanings of words. Botanical and zoological terms being frequently wrong in English-German dictionaries, we have always gone back to their Latin equivalents (as found in English standard works) to give the proper meanings. For terms belonging to mineralogy, chemistry, physics, and technology, the best modern authorities have been referred to, and in dubious cases experts have been consulted. Thus we are indebted for part of the nautical terms to Herr von Görne, formerly an officer in the Imperial Navy, now a master at the Chief Military College, Lichterfelde, who made compilations from Paasch's "Vom Kiel zum Flaggenknopf", while our best thanks are due to Captain Weiss, of Neisse, for contributing a valuable list of military terms.

Apart from containing a larger number of idioms, the present work differs from most other dictionaries of a similar size in paying more attention to the customs, manners, and institutions of the two countries, in briefly, but — let us hope — sufficiently explaining words relating to literature, history, and social life, and in inserting many poetical quotations, as well as foreign expressions, of frequent occurrence in English writers.

Considering the purpose and size of this dictionary, it does not seem necessary to mention every single book used in its preparation. Suffice it to say that hardly any of the existing dictionaries, whether large or small, German-English or English-English, claiming an independent value of their own, have been left unused. For the technical terms, including those of chemistry and natural philosophy, Eger's "Technologisches Wörterbuch", for commercial terms Eitzen's excellent and trustworthy "Wörterbuch der Handelssprache", together with other similar works, have done excellent service. It seems also worth mentioning that Roget's "Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases" (Edition of 1884), a work hitherto not turned to sufficient account by editors of dictionaries, has been a constant and useful help. It stands to reason that we have embodied in our work whatever we gained during a several years' stay in England, or, in the course of years, have gleaned from English authors, periodicals, and newspapers. We hope, therefore, that on the whole this dictionary may prove "up to date".

One of our chief tasks was the arrangement of the matter. Etymology being considered out of place in a book intended for school and home, it would still have been misleading, if words of the same form, but of entirely different origin, had been placed under one and the same heading. But, after the primitive words had once been distinguished and separated, it did not, as a rule, seem necessary to proceed in like manner with their derivatives or compounds. Nor was it deemed advisable to make an attempt to develop the various shades of meaning from the original signification of a word, the less so, as in many cases this primitive signification is entirely lost in the modern language, or, at least, greatly obscured and effaced. So we have preferred to start from some fundamental signification, and to subjoin the different shades of meaning in as natural an order as possible. Idiomatic phrases have been put in their proper places, immediately under the particular signification to which they by right belong, whereas in most other dictionaries all sorts of meanings are simply enumerated without any attempt being made at a strict arrangement, or, if the principal significations be classified, little or no attention is paid to assigning their natural places to the idiomatic phrases.

In order to insure a higher degree of clearness we have taken care not to make too many divisions, or subdivisions, in the meanings of words. The regular grammatical inflections and formations have been supposed to be already familiar to the student; all deviations, or irregularities, however, and in dubious cases even the normal inflections, have been given throughout. The same may be said about the adjectives and verbs with the cases, or prepositions, following them. Our system of signs and abbreviations will prove plain and intelligible enough, and render it unnecessary for the reader to be constantly referring to the lists subjoined to the preface; more especially the abbreviations of the names of sciences, arts, and trades have been restricted to as small a number as possible.

In conclusion, we feel it to be a pleasant duty incumbent upon us to express our warmest thanks not only to the two gentlemen above named, but to all those who helped us in their work, in particular to Prof. Dr. Bandow, Director of the Luisenstädtische Oberrealschule, Berlin, who was kind enough to let us profit by some valuable lexical collections, to Mr. Harsley, English Lecturer in the University of Berlin, to Miss Connell and Mrs. Koch of Lichterfelde, who kindly helped us out of many a puzzling difficulty, and finally to Miss Anna Schmidt (Lichterfelde), who by carefully reading the proof-sheets has well deserved of this work.

In no less degree are our thanks due to Mr. Friedrich Westermann, the publisher, who did not shrink from any sacrifice of time or money to make the get-up of this book answer to the requirements of the present day, and who, at the very outset, most readily and obligingly complied with our wish for a large and readable type.

July, 1895.

Immanuel Schmidt, Gustav Tanger, Lichterfelde. Berlin.

REMARKS.

We add a few hints, which it will be useful to bear in mind when using this Second Part of our Dictionary. As has been stated already in the preface to the First Section, we have taken the pronunciation of the educated classes of Berlin as our standard, and have limited ourselves to noting merely the principal accent (or stress) in words of two or more syllables by means of an acute ('), and the length of vowels by a horizontal stroke (ā), when the spelling of a word does not clearly show a vowel to be long. Thus short vowels are left unmarked. In order to avoid dispute, we have thought it best to leave the quality of German vowels altogether out of consideration, especially on account of the rather questionable quality of the vowel "e". Besides, however necessary a thorough marking of the pronunciation may be in English words, it cannot be considered so in German; as any student who is acquainted with the general rules of German pronunciation, and has paid due attention to the spelling, will be able to give each word its proper sound, when informed about the place of the main stress and the quantity of the vowels. In the few cases where there might be room for doubt, we have not failed to add a short hint in [ ] brackets, e. g. wach'sen [wak'sen], as compared to wach'sam.

Grammatical inflections have only been added after simple substantives: Baum, ~es, pl. Bäu'me; whereas in compound words (e.g. Kirsch'baum) the reader will have to refer to the primary word. The pronunciation of foreign words, to which a § has been prefixed, has been transcribed in German types, when it seemed necessary.

As regards the use of the auxiliaries "sein" or "haben" for the formation of compound tenses, it is only after intransitive or neuter verbs that we have deemed it necessary to put (s.) or (h.) in parenthesis after the verb: schlā'fen (schlāfst, schlāft; schlief, geschlā'fen), i. (h.), all transitive or active, as well as reflective verbs, uniformly taking "haben".

Verbs to which the preterite and the participle past have not been added in parenthesis, may be considered as regular or weak; strong or irregular verbs, however, are in the present dictionary never left without some notice concerning their principal forms of conjugation.

The tilde (~), as in the First Part, serves to denote:

a) the whole word: Schlack'e, ~n (= Schlack'en);

b) that part of a word standing before ‖: Schluß'‖wort, ~zeile = Schluß'zeile.

Brackets [ ] immediately after a large-print word only serve to indicate the pronunciation.

The parenthesis ( ) contains variations in spelling, explanations, and other remarks not concerning pronunciation, especially statements of grammatical irregularities.
